FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

January 12, 1882.
 In the windows of the foreign booksellers' shops of London there still appears a photograph of a well-known picture, which is at once a marvellous bit of realistic art in the way of historic accuracy of detail and a cruel and subtle caricature. The artist transports us to the dark ages, presumably about the period when the Cimbric and Teutonic hordes were settling into the nations that gradually formed the central and western and northern European countries of our day. A Gothic army is making its public entry into an ancient city through a gloomy archway surrounded by heavy batelemented turrets, as little as possible like the modern Ar de Triomphe at Paris. The barbaric horde is headed by three striking and warlike figures on horseback. The ponderous steeds, with unkempt manes and fetlocks, are caparisoned in primitive simplicity, and the riders, if kings or princes in their tribes, are unmistakably savages; but each of the three could be matched at random in any average crowd of modern English or Germans. The central figure is aged, but rides erect with the bearing of a monarch, but with head bare and his wild hair and beard streaming in the wind, the personification of unpretensions power. To his right is a middle-aged henchman: with a simple steel head piece set firmly on his stern relentless brow; and to the left is a younger tribesman—maybe a prince—his head flung back in puerile glee, the straight unruly and tufted hair giving him something of the appearance of a red Indian, but still unquestionably Gothic in type. This picture as a caricature is clever and artistic but tri-trial. The Germans can afford to smile at it as a manifestation of impotent malice; but for them and all of us it has a strange significance. The Latin mind and nation-are at this moment as much divided from the newer races in Europe as they were nineteen centuries ago when Cæsar ordered his Cimbrian recruits to aim at the faces of the curled and perfumed Roman youth in Pompey's army. Putting aside national vanity, forgetting our achievements in literature, science and arms, and looking at ourselves en philosphite' we Goths, Cimbr and Teutons are still in many re spect savages. Our ukenunt war horses trample on Celt and Roman but we are slow in ridding our steeds of barbaric trappings. The Holy Ro man Empire has ceased to exist. It has been supplanted by a modern creation; the German Empire, dat ing only from 1871. The venue has been changed from Milan or Vienna to Berlin, and the style of the em pire may be new, but the ideal, the image of monarchy half warrior half priest, the worship of the German tribes, the spirit of the monarchies of Charlemagne and Otto the Great are still existent. Moreover that spirit is about to move on the face of the waters with a power which until lately had been dormant for five centuries.

Municipal and Parliamentary liberties are in point of fact of Latin origin. Civilisation in Central and Northern Europe commenced with the Hanseatic League, which was in some respects a copy of what had ruled previously in Italian cities. Serdicio, as a political institution, and as distinguished from the gross or forms of slavery, was a Gothic invention. Politically and legislatively, serfdom is now more thoroughly extinguished in Germany than in England, but the spirit of serfdom, the superstition that origi-
